Contest
Your speech could win $2,000 and qualify you for Nationals.

We're living longer, healthier lives. Reaching age 100 is no longer unusual, and outliving assets is now the biggest financial worry of most working Americans. Sound retirement planning is more important than ever.

The Lincoln Financial Group Video Speech Contest gives you an opportunity to learn about the advantages of retirement planning, compete for a college scholarship and qualify for Nationals all at the same time.

What are the prizes?
- The first-place winner will receive a $2,000 scholarship
- The second-place winner will receive a $1,000 scholarship
- Both winners will qualify for expository speaking at the 2005 NFL National Tournament in Philadelphia, PA.
- Video excerpts from the winning speeches will be on LFG.com.
- Coaches of each winner will be awarded a $500 honorarium.

What's the topic?
100 Years Young: The importance of retirement planning to meet the challenge of increased longevity

Who's eligible?
You are - if you are a high school speech student and a member of the National Forensic League.

How does the contest work?
- You must prepare an original expository speech no more than five minutes in length. No props permitted.
- The speech must be videotaped (VHS format) - production quality will not be part of the judging. Lincoln will retape the winning speeches, if necessary, for the excerpts on LFG.com.
- Only one videotaped speech per school may be submitted. If several students in your school wish to participate, a school elimination should be held.

When’s the deadline?
All entries are due to Lincoln Financial Group on or before March 28, 2005.

Entries should be mailed to:
Lincoln Financial Group
NFL Video Speech Contest
1300 S. Clinton St. – 6H05
Fort Wayne, IN 46802

Include with your VHS videotape a typed transcript of your speech and include the name, address and phone number of the student, coach and school.

Who's judging?
A panel of judges from Lincoln Financial Group will select the winners. Judges' decisions are final. Winners will be contacted by April 22, 2005 and will receive their awards at the 2005 NFL National Tournament in Philadelphia.

Who is Lincoln Financial Group?
Lincoln Financial Group celebrates its centennial in 2005. One hundred years young, Lincoln is a Fortune 500 company with diverse wealth accumulation and protection businesses. As the NFL's overall corporate sponsor, Lincoln funds the national tournament and provides $88,000 in college scholarships and awards.
From the Editor

J. Scott Wunn

Dear NFL,

I would like to thank all of the coaches and students that participated in The People Speak Initiative. During September and October, NFL members held over 3,000 discussions and debates on foreign policy issues. On the eve of the Presidential election, these community wide events became even more meaningful as voters discussed and informed one another on the issues that face our nation and world. NFL students found themselves in American Legion halls, community buildings, retirement villages, Lion’s and Rotary meetings, state fairs, and church bazaars. Our partnership with the UN Foundation, ABC news and 30 other organizations has opened up wonderful opportunities for students across America to discuss their role in the world and to showcase the educational value of high school forensics. In this month’s issue we are proud to highlight many of the hundreds of outstanding intergenerational discussions that took place.

In addition, please join me in thanking Chairman, Ted Turner, and the UN Foundation for their continued support of the National Forensic League. UN Foundation President, Timothy E. Wirth and his staff should be commended for their excellent organization of such a tremendous nationwide event.

Lincoln and the NFL celebrate milestone anniversaries in Philadelphia in 2005

By: Kara Sax, Marketing Specialist,
Lincoln Financial Group

The clock striking 12 has been a daily routine that has been in existence since we've known time. This event, while rather taken for granted, marks every new day, every New Year, and every new millennium. Time is life's most basic inevitable.

As crowds gather, hearts beat faster and countdowns begin on December 31, the National Forensic League, Lincoln Financial Group and Philadelphia have special reasons to celebrate.

On the momentous midnight marking the start of 2005, the NFL celebrates their 80th season of national tournaments, Lincoln turns 100 and Philadelphia prepares to be invaded by the nation's best high school oratorical scholars.

The City of Brotherly love – home of the corporate headquarters of Lincoln Financial Group and not to mention, the best cheese steaks money can buy – is the site of the 2005 Lincoln Financial Group/NFL National Speech Tournament. NFL participants: Get your game faces on, focus on your event, and strive to be invited to the biggest party of 2005!

Some of America's brightest young minds, most intriguing and entertaining individuals and future leaders will come to compete. Take your place among them in events hosted by both of these two superior organizations – Lincoln and the NFL.

Their names represent superb reputations, a commitment to excellence and distinguished histories of service. Their partnership is stronger than ever as they celebrate milestone anniversaries in 2005.

So, when the chimes of midnight ring in the New Year, make a resolution to compete or simply attend or support this momentous event in Philadelphia!

Momentous midnight, we anxiously await you!

Lincoln-Douglas Debate: Values in Conflict
2nd Edition ©2000
The basics of Lincoln-Douglas debate for novice and intermediate debaters
The most complete introduction available on preparing for and participating in the Lincoln-Douglas (L-D) debate format.
Short, well-designed chapters move students through L-D analysis, case construction, and case defense procedures. Students learn about:
- L-D theory
- the difference between L-D debate and policy debate
- how to choose and research value topics
- preparing cases
- developing rebuttal strategies
- improving delivery skills
A Teacher Guide features activities, additional L-D topics, ballots, quizzes and answer keys, and more!

Resources for teaching value debate
Practical, everyday materials help teachers build and sharpen their instructional practices.
This book contains something for every instructor, regardless of experience, including:
- the basics of L-D debate
- a grounding in theory
- development and construction of value debate cases
- activities and lectures on three levels
- options for unit length
- improvement of delivery

Philosophy in Practice: Understanding Value Debate ©1996
Philosophical theories and concepts in understandable terms
This book is an invaluable resource for value debate preparation! Students can use authoritative insight from philosophers, such as Hobbs, Locke, Rousseau, Kant, Nietzsche, Aristotle, and others. The material is presented in an easy-to-use format and is identified for novice, intermediate, or advanced debaters. Chapters on L-D debate theory are also included.

Logic in LD

By Jason Baldwin

[Editor’s Note: The first three sections of this article appeared in last month’s Rosstrum, and readers should consult those sections for explanations of arguments and terminology mentioned below. The article is the second of three on the use of logic in LD. The first article, in October, introduced basic logical theory; the current article applies logic to aspects of casing; and the third article, in January, will apply logic to cross-examination and rebuttal strategy.]

IV. Value Premise(s)

In many regions, LD cases are expected to begin with a statement of a “value premise” and “criterion.” Each of these items is expressed by a single word or phrase; together, they are supposed to provide standards by which judges should evaluate subsequent arguments. Sometimes the value premise is drawn straight from the resolution, as when the resolution mentions morality or justice. At other times, the value premise is chosen by the debaters as the single most relevant axis of evaluation for a generic “ought” statement. The criterion is typically thought of as a more detailed specification of the content of the value premise. For example, if a debater proposes a value premise of morality, she might go on to propose a criterion of maximizing the balance of pleasure over pain. The point would then be that the resolution is true if the course of action it prescribes is moral, and that that course of action is moral if it maximizes the balance of pleasure over pain. This is only a rough sketch of a very confused and confusing area of LD theory.

I am going to challenge the traditional value premise/criterion model, but I want first to acknowledge its merits. It is the model I was taught and used as a debater. It has served a valuable function by imposing order on cases that might otherwise have been unshapely piles of unrelated points. It can give judges a helpful focus for assessing the relevance of various claims at the end of a round. I have myself written a sympathetic exposition of the model (see the November 1997 Rostrum).

However, the model has many shortcomings. First, it is notoriously hard to say precisely how the value premise is related to the resolution and how the criterion is related to the value premise. Debaters often speak of the value premise as “supporting” the resolution or of the criterion as “fulfilling” the value premise, but it is hard to know just what these descriptions mean.

Second, because value premises and criteria are nouns or noun phrases, it is often unclear how they connect with the claims unique to either side of the resolution. Suppose the resolution is that “The possession of nuclear weapons is immoral.” If the affirmative says, “My value premise is morality,” what should this lead us to expect from his arguments? Will he be claiming that someone or some action is moral? The resolution would lead us to think the affirmative will be claiming that something is immoral. If so, why is the affirmative’s value premise morality? If the affirmative succeeds in proving the possession of nuclear weapons immoral, he won’t have proven that any person or action is moral. Instead, he will have shown that a certain action is not moral. So in what sense will anyone have “fulfilled” or “upheld” morality? And who would have done it—the affirmative debater, or the (non)possessors of nuclear weapons?

A third problem with the traditional model is that it does not distinguish between necessary and sufficient conditions for satisfying a value. Suppose the value premise is morality and the criterion is respecting innocent life. Does that mean that if an action is moral, then it respects innocent life? Or does it instead mean that if an action respects innocent life, then it is moral? In the former case, respecting life would be a necessary condition of morality; in the latter, a sufficient condition. The simple terms that compose a traditional value premise and criterion obscure this important logical distinction.

A fourth problem, and perhaps the central problem, with the traditional model is that it separates the value premise and criterion from the contentions, where the substantive arguments are thought to be. Since many debaters are confused about how the value premise and criterion are supposed to function and they have what seem to be self-contained arguments in their contentions, they end up ignoring the value premise and criterion and focusing only on contention arguments. Defenders of the traditional model will say (rightly) that this results from a misunderstanding of the model. However, that misunderstanding is widespread enough that the model is falling out of use among people who find it too unwieldy to apply.

These disadvantages give us reason to search for a better way of organizing LD arguments. To anyone wedded to the traditional model I have been criticizing, it should be a striking fact that moral and political philosophers who write about some of the same issues debated in LD never appeal a value premise or criterion (in the LD sense). Instead, their arguments resemble the formally valid sets of premises and conclusions we have examined above.

The key point to notice is that there are no missing steps in a formally valid argument—there is nothing left that a value premise or criterion could add. The premises of a valid argument are sufficient to prove its conclusion, and if that conclusion is the resolution or its denial, the argument proves enough for LD purposes. I suggest that LD cases be composed of valid deductive arguments with no logically independent value premises or criteria. So the model I am proposing really amounts to the model of deductive argument that philosophers have been using for centuries.

This model avoids the four problems with the traditional value premise/criterion model I outlined above. I will not explain in detail how, but interested readers can examine a valid argument in the light of each problem and see that the problem does not arise for the argument.

Do I suggest abandoning all talk of value premises? No, because many judges are expecting to hear debaters offer value premises and may penalize debaters who do not. (It may also be worth noting that the NFL’s official “Lincoln-Douglas Debate Guidelines” state that LDers should establish value premises and values criteria. They go on to define values criteria as “a system upon which to judge values,” but they do not say anything very helpful about what that means.) Fortunately, the valid argument model gives us a ready candidate for a revised version of the value premise that is not logically irrelevant to the constructive arguments. Where \( p \) is the conclusion of a constructive argument, the value premise will generally be the conditional premise in which \( p \) appears as consequent (if the argument employs modus ponens) or in which \( \sim p \) appears as antecedent (if the argument employs modus tollens). Because our sample argument above employed modus ponens, the value premise would be \( (2) \), since this is the premise whose consequent is the conclusion (the resolution) which we are proving.

A major difference between this model and the traditional model is that the value premise is now a complete sentence rather than a noun or noun phrase. This is all to the good, since a premise is, by definition, a sentence or proposition. In fact, it is mysterious how a word or phrase could ever have come to be called a value premise in the first place. While the new value premise avoids the problems with the old model, it can still serve a similar function if it appears near the beginning of a case or argument. It still provides the audience with a standard or goal to use in evaluating the success of the argument. It tells listeners when they will have a sufficient reason to conclude that the resolution is true—namely, when the debater has shown the antecedent of the value premise to be true (or, in the case of a modus tollens argument, the consequent of the value premise to be false).

The fact that this value premise is pulled straight out of a valid argument also calls attention to the fact that it must be explained and defended just like any other premise if the argument is to succeed. Many debaters using the traditional model simply announce a value premise and criterion without really justifying their selection. It is easy to get by with this if the value premise and criterion play no essential role in the structure of one’s arguments. But in the new model, constructive arguments will not be convincing unless the value premise is also convincing. This premise will always be a normative premise, and it will typically be the most important and controversial normative premise in an argument. Therefore, the value premise will often merit extensive explanation and support in its own right. Depending on the structure of the argument, it may be appropriate to spend more time arguing in support of one’s value premise than in support of any other single premise of one’s argument. Establishing this premise will often be the most philosophically challenging task of an LD case. This model makes better sense of the importance many judges place on “the standards debate.” These judges want to see debate over conflicting normative premises, and the new model is well suited to promote just such debate.

A case that contains more than one independent argument may have more than one value premise. If separate case arguments require separate value premises, each premise should be stated and defended separately. Many traditionalists will view the possibility of multiple value premises in a single case with suspicion, and I share their concern. A case with multiple value premises may end up sounding incoherent or even inconsistent. I am inclined to think that for most students most of the time, developing arguments under a single value premise is the best strategy. I have found that LD students invariably regard themselves as exceptions to such generalizations; to any students reading this, I can only say, I mean you—you should probably try to construct cases with a single value premise.

Recognizing the rare situations when multiple value premises might be appropriate requires a skillful sensitivity to the particulars of combinations of arguments which I cannot impart through this article. Here is the extent of what I can say in general terms: Multiple value premises are likely to work best in cases which seek to prove that some practice is immoral or not justified. There are many ways for actions to go wrong, so distinct value premises might identify distinct sufficient conditions for an action’s immorality or unjustifiability; each independent contention could then prove the action immoral or unjustified by showing it failed to satisfy the requirements stated in one of the various value premises. But, as I say, it is usually safer and clearer to choose contention arguments that work together under a single value premise.

I have proposed a revised understanding of the value premise, but is there any place for a revised version of the criterion in my model? Yes and no. Yes, in the sense that value premises of the kind I am recommending often function as criteria: they give judges standards or goals by which to measure an argument’s success. In fact, often the new-style value premise will contain a phrase that, by itself, could function as an old-style criterion. For example, in (2) above, the notion of keeping promises, which occurs in the antecedent, might serve as a criterion for morality, which occurs in the conclusion. When the resolution itself mentions a value term (such as “morally obligated” in our example), the complete new-style value premise will contain both the old-style value premise and the old-style criterion.

But when the resolution does not mention a value term, there may be two normative premises, one of which is naturally treated as the value premise and the other of which is naturally treated as the criterion. Suppose, for example, that instead of directly mentioning moral obligation, our resolution said simply that the U.S. ought to mitigate international conflicts. Now what had been a single premise (2) may be split into two separate premises: one which says that if the U.S. is morally obligated to mitigate conflicts, then the U.S. ought to mitigate conflicts, and one which says that if the U.S. promised to mitigate international conflicts, then the U.S. is morally obligated to mitigate international conflicts. The first of these premises might be called the value premise since it proposes moral obligation as the relevant ought-making relationship. And the second might be called the criterion since it proposes promise keeping as a necessary condition of satisfying one’s moral obligations.

In situations of the first kind I discuss, where a value term appears in the resolution, I believe proposing a criterion distinct from the value premise would be unnecessary and confusing. The value premise already contains the term which would have been treated as the criterion in the old paradigm, so nothing of substance is lost by simply dropping talk of the criterion. In these cases, the criterion is simply part of the value premise.

However, in situations of the second kind I discuss, where the resolution does not mention a value term (typically using an open-ended “ought” instead), it may be wise to retain a distinct criterion. In these cases, the value premise and criterion will each be a complete conditional premise of the argument. Where \( r \) is the conclusion (the resolution or its negation), \( q \rightarrow r \) will be the value premise, and \( p \rightarrow q \) will be the criterion. If this is not immediately clear to you, study the example from the paragraph before last to see how such new-style value premises and criteria might be related. Like so much else in debate, deciding whether to retain a distinct criterion requires careful judgments about particular resolutions and arguments.

Finally, is there a way to present genuine premises as value premises and/or criteria without alienating traditional judges who expect words and phrases rather than sentences? I believe there is. A debater may simply pick the most value-laden word or phrase from her value premise or criterion and state this term as the (old-fashioned) value premise or criterion. She may then follow this word or phrase with a complete statement of the full premise. For example, a debater might say, “My value premise is respecting gender equality. In other words, if pornography disrespects gender equality, then government censorship of sexually explicit materials is justified.” This statement should then be followed by an explanation and defense of the premise.

V. Contention Development

The toughest thought-work of case construction is now complete: extensive research has uncovered numerous argument ideas, and the best of these have been formally mapped and analyzed to show exactly which premises are required to sustain the conclusion and also what kinds of support will be needed to sustain the premises. One, two, or at most three of these mapped arguments have been selected for inclusion in the constructive speech itself, and authentic value premises have also been identified. The work that remains to transform these skeletal arguments into a presentable LD case falls largely into the domains of rhetoric and composition—subjects we will not take up here. But the logic-centered model of argument does have a few implications for this final stage of casing which we should notice.

The first implication is one at which I have already hinted: Each contention should be a distinct valid argument concluding in the resolution or its negation. This means that if only one really strong constructive argument emerges from your research and brainstorming, you should expect to have a one-contention case. Some LD traditionalists have a fetish for two- or three-contention cases and will split a single argument into more than one contention if necessary. I cannot see what is gained by this practice, and I have often seen something lost. Students instinctively think of their contentions as free-standing argument units, and when pressed for time, they will sometimes abandon one contention (usually the last of two or three) in order to defend another. In the case of truly independent arguments, this strategy, while not ideal, need not be disastrous. But in the case of a single argument spread out over several contentions, the maneuver is fatal. No one contention in such a case provides a self-contained reason to believe or disbelieve the resolution. If one contention falls, the others are worthless. If that same single argument had been presented as one contention instead of two or three, the student would have been less likely to think of any part of the argument as dispensable.

Of course, the ideal is to present two or three truly independent arguments to affirm or negate the resolution. It is worth spending a lot of time in research and planning to try to discover two or three such arguments. But sometimes there really is only one excellent constructive argument, and to include another one or two mediocre arguments in the case would dilute the power of the strong argument. Since different arguments will appeal to different people, you should run your contention candidates by a variety of peers and adults (including plenty from outside debate) before you narrow your case to a single argument. It will often be worth including a second or third argument which you personally find uninspiring if other people find it persuasive.

The second implication of logic-centered argumentation for case writing is that each premise of a valid argument should be explicitly stated and defended. The key normative premises may be stated and defended as value premises before the contentions proper begin. But each premise should find its way into the case somewhere.

A premise need not be stated exactly as it appears in the argument map. To ensure formal validity, the argument map forced you to state most premises as if-then conditionals. Most such conditionals can be phrased more naturally in your case as non-conditionals. For example, consider this premise of our specimen argument above:

(1") If the U.S. signed Treaty T, then the U.S. promised to "use all reasonable means, diplomatic and military, to restore peace to war-torn regions of the world."

No one would really talk like this in a persuasive speech. You could communicate the same point of the conditional (1") with this non-conditional sentence:

By signing Treaty T, our nation promised to abide by all of its provisions, including the requirement that we, quote, "use all reasonable means, diplomatic and military, to restore peace to war-torn regions of the world."

Anytime you rephrase a premise from your argument map, you should be very careful that your rephrasing communicates exactly the same thought as the old premise. You will have preserved that equivalence of meaning if, roughly, the old premise is true only if the new premise is true, and the new premise is true only if the old premise is true.

Note that premises should be stated and defended. Occasionally an argument will contain an especially obvious premise that needs no defense, other than one or two restatements in different words to make the point clear for listeners. But most important premises, including definitional premises, are controversial to one degree or another and should be defended. A crude rule of thumb is that each premise should receive a paragraph's worth of explanation and defense. This rule is crude because a few premises (as we have noted) will require little or no defense, whereas some premises may require many paragraphs to establish. Sometimes defending a premise requires constructing a mini-argument of which the premise is the conclusion. These further arguments can normally be incorporated into expansions of the argument map, as illustrated above.

At this point, clever readers may wonder if it's really possible to defend every premise. If a premise is defended with a further argument, won't that argument itself contain premises which must be defended, and so on, to infinity? This reaction is correct—it is impossible to deductively prove every premise on which an argument depends. At some point, the formal arguments must end, and the base-level premises must be treated as postulates (OK if they are obviously true) or motivated by non-argumentative appeals (e.g., appeals to moral intuitions or emotions). Some people think LD should be about "pure logic," but that is not possible as long as LD is supposed to yield substantive conclusions. To get off the ground, every argument must begin with some premises that are simply asserted. No substantive conclusions follow from logic alone; this is just a fact about logic, not a shortcoming of LD.

Empirical premises will require empirical evidence, although you will keep a better grip on your audience's attention if you explain most of the empirical background in your own words and quote outside authors only briefly to confirm crucial details or conclusions. Reading long quotations is never impressive. It suggests the speaker has simply lifted his arguments wholesale from other sources and may not really understand the research. Whenever you use empirical evidence, you should sandwich it between your own explanation of its source, content, and significance for the argument. Evidence is not self-interpreting. You must be scrupulously accurate in the ways you characterize the claims of your cited authors. It is tempting to exaggerate a source's limited claim so that it better supports the sweeping claim of your premise, but doing so is dishonest, and responsible judges will not reward the practice.

Normative premises will require non-empirical support. Sometimes quoting a particularly clear or persuasive source (such as a philosopher) can bolster such a premise, but often you will have to resort to your own persuasive powers. One of the classic ways in which philosophers argue for their own normative premises is by the use of examples or analogies. Most of the normative principles that might apply to a given resolution are broad enough to apply to other issues as well. One of the traditional purposes of moral and political philosophy is to furnish a relatively small number of principles that will apply to many different situations. So chances are, the normative principle to which you appeal has a wider application. Pick some obvious non-resolutional situation to which the principle might apply. Describe a possible moral decision in that situation about which you and your audience will share moral intuitions and about which your principle gives the proper outcome—the outcome that matches everyone's intuitions. This non-resolutional example may then count as some evidence that the normative principle is correct.

For definitional or analytic premises, you will need, at a minimum, to explain in full detail just why the premise is necessarily true. When appropriate, you should also quote authoritative definitions to support your claim. Consider a premise as trivial as, "If John is a bachelor, then John is a man." You might defend this premise by saying, "A bachelor is, by definition, an unmarried man. All bachelors, therefore, are men, so if John is a bachelor, he's a man, too.” This explanation did not cite authoritative sources, because it assumes that every adult English speaker knows the definition of “bachelor.” But if the claim were about a more technical or obscure concept, such as genetic engineering, the Second Amendment, or globalization, then quoting an expert source that described the concept would probably be necessary.

Ultimately, there is no formula for adequately explaining and defending each premise of an argument. Distinguishing the three types of premises as we have can be some help, but each premise will require a unique treatment. The best way to see how different sorts of premises can be supported is to study how they actually are supported by scholars in the relevant disciplines or by high-quality public intellectuals.

By thinking of contentions as arguments and premises as the basic units of contentions, you can avoid the confusion that debaters often inject into rounds by their attempts to break contentions into different “subpoints.” It is often unclear just how the various subpoints are distinguished from one another and how they are functioning in a constructive argument. Anyone who wants to retain talk about “subpoints” in his or her cases should probably think of each premise as a distinct subpoint. I don’t find most explicit subpoint talk helpful or attractive, but people who do should conform such talk to the logic of their arguments.

A third implication of the logic-centered approach for contention building is that premises must be presented in an order the audience will find persuasive and easy to follow. You might think that the best order of premises for any argument will be the order you have used in your argument map, but this is not always so. The argument map itself represents only one valid formulation of the argument; the same premises could have been ordered differently and still have yielded the same conclusion. So the map does not settle much about the order of presentation.

We have already seen that where $q$ is the conclusion of your argument, the conditional premise $p \rightarrow q$ in which $q$ occurs as the consequent will typically be the value premise that is appropriately presented before the other premises of the argument. Apart from LD convention, there is a good rhetorical reason to present this premise first. By doing so, you are setting a fixed target for yourself. Consider this simple modus ponens argument:

1. Capital punishment deters crime.
2. If capital punishment deters crime, then capital punishment is morally justified.
3. So capital punishment is morally justified.

Here, (1) is an empirical premise, while (2) is clearly normative. If you presented the argument in just the order it is mapped above, some listeners might have the following reaction: “He just researched what capital punishment does, discovered it deters crime, and then cooked up an ad hoc moral principle to conclude that if capital punishment does whatever it does, it must be moral.” In other words, it may look as if you have set a moving target for yourself—whatever capital punishment does, that’s what you claim makes it morally justified. If instead you present (2) before (1), your approach looks more principled. It looks as if you have first identified what quality makes a punishment, any punishment, morally justified, and then gone out into the world (so to speak) to see if capital punishment does, in fact, have that quality. The substance of your claims has not changed, but the argument may be more effective for some listeners.

As far as the other, non-value premises go, you will have to use your best judgment about the most effective order of presentation. Generally, you should be moving more or less sequentially through your argument map, but sometimes you may want to work from start to finish, other times from finish to start. Before you begin actually writing the contention, you may want to write each premise on a separate slip of paper and then experiment with different orderings to see which will make the argument most accessible to your audience.

A fourth and final implication of the logic-centered approach for case writing is that you must make the logical structure of your arguments clear to your audience. You cannot just assume that by presenting and defending a set of premises which do, in fact, entail an announced conclusion, you will have persuaded your audience that those premises really do entail that conclusion. Because you have spent much time researching and formulating the argument and have studied it in skeletal form, it is easy for you to see the logical relationships among its various parts. But your listeners are meeting the argument for the first time when they hear your case, and they may not be accustomed to tracing the logical implications of different premises.

The best way to ensure that your audience grasps the logical character of your argument is to call their attention to it at various points throughout your case. You do not need to use the jargon of premises, validity, modus ponens, and the like, nor do you need to retrace in explicit if-then form the full shape of the argument. But you do need to preview arguments before you make them and review them after you have made them. You can preview arguments near the beginning of your case or at the start of each contention. A suitable preview for the sample argument we mapped in Part III might be, “In my first contention, I will show that the United States is obligated to mitigate international conflicts because it has promised to do so in certain treaties.” The equally brief review might be of all contentions together at the very end of the case.

In addition to previewing and reviewing, you need to flag distinct premises and logical connections throughout each contention. You can do so by smaller-scale previews and reviews within the contention (“First, I will argue that the U.S. is morally obligated to keep its promises”) and also by the use of logical conjunctions like “since,” “because,” and “therefore.”

The basic point is that as a speaker, you are responsible not merely to present logically valid arguments, but to make the validity of those arguments clear to your audience. The logical relations between your premises will be no more clear to many listeners than the truth or falsehood of individual premises. Just as you must persuade your audience to believe each premise of your argument, so you must persuade them that the premises, taken together, form a logical whole.

We have covered a lot of ground in this article. A logic-centered approach to arguments has implications for interpreting burdens, conducting research, outlining contentions, framing value premises, and organizing contentions. Next month we will explore its implications for cross-examination and rebuttals.²

Dear NFL Students and Debate Coaches:

In September and October, just as America was gearing up for the November elections and calm, measured discussion was in short supply, a dialogue was taking place all across the country on the topic of America’s role in the world. As part of this national discussion series called The People Speak, events took place in high schools, universities, places of worship, and community centers in small towns and large cities alike. At the heart of this effort was the National Forensic League (NFL). On behalf of the United Nations Foundation and The People Speak, I would like to express my deep appreciation to all of the student debaters, who so diligently researched and expertly delivered their remarks, and to the debate coaches, who prepared their students and made these events possible.

NFL has been an integral partner of The People Speak for two years now. This year, NFL debaters were involved in discussions not just with their fellow students, but with the wider community. When students such as Tripp Rebrowick, who introduced Ted Turner at our marquee event in Nashville, showed such poise and eloquence in addressing and questioning senators and ambassadors, all in attendance knew that they had caught a glimpse of our future leaders. It was similarly heartening to see lively exchanges between students and Rotarians, American Legion Members, and members of other civic organizations. Promoting such open lines of communication between generations and between individuals who might not regularly interact is very much in the spirit of The People Speak.

To everyone who participated in The People Speak, thank you for your hard work and enthusiasm. To tell the story of The People Speak in numbers, over 4,000 grassroots events and 24 marquee events moderated by ABC News correspondents took place in September and October at a rate of approximately 100 events per day. Through extensive news coverage, over 20 million people heard, read, or saw something about The People Speak. NFL, which organized the lion’s share of The People Speak events, contributed greatly to the success of this effort. As we plan for the future of The People Speak, we hope that NFL will continue to be a part of this important endeavor.

Sincerely,

Timothy E. Wirth

Resolved: Signing international environmental treaties benefits the United States

By Sarah Gildea

On October 4th, Montgomery Bell Academy hosted a Ted Turner Public Forum exhibition debate in Nashville, Tennessee. Two students from Montgomery Bell Academy, Tripp Rebrovich and Jonathan Ray, debated two students from Nashville's Overton High School, Liza Short and Wesley Messamore. In conjunction with The People Speak, a national initiative that encourages discussion about America's role in the world, the teams debated the topic, "Resolved, signing international environmental treaties benefits the United States." The debate was followed by a question and answer session with Mr. Ted Turner himself, who attended the debate. An avid environmentalist, Ted Turner fielded questions related to those raised in the debate as well as those involving the International Criminal Court, this year's Presidential Election, and his personal business philosophies. A former championship NFL debater, Mr. Turner is the founder of numerous business and philanthropic ventures including CNN and the Goodwill Games, as well as the Chairman of the United Nations Foundation. This event, to which Nashville area schools were invited, increased discourse on our nation's environmental policies and gave NFL members a chance to hear one of our nation's leading voices in environmental reform.

Manchester Essex held a Public Forum intergenerational debate on a resolution dealing with U.S. support of U.N. Peacekeeping operations. The senior team supported the con, saying the U.S. should not do more. The students won pro, and were won by a vote of 87 to 52.

Students can learn a lot from their elders, especially when it comes to politics and issues of national importance.

Members of the Manchester Essex Regional High School debate team are taking every opportunity to get these lessons.

The debate team went to Brooksby Village retirement home in Peabody Monday for an “inter-generational debate” to discuss whether the United States should increase its support of the United Nations. Chris Comenos, a junior, and Chloe Viner, a senior, spoke for the team in front of an audience of 139 people.

This is the third year the team has traveled to Brooksby Village, where a current events club for residents focuses on many of the same topics as the team.

Residents of the retirement home lived through many of the events the team discusses, Averill said, so they present views and perspectives the students benefit from hearing about.

This year’s debate was part of a national effort sponsored by the United Nations Foundation in Washington, D.C., to promote public discussion of the role of the United Nations in today’s world.

Comenos and Viner debated two members of the current events club. At the end of the debate, the audience voted in favor of increasing U.S. support of the United Nations.

“We had an outstanding discussion of the United Nations and U.S. policy,” Averill said. “In general, the audience endorsed the idea that the U.S. ought to work with other countries.”

Averill said the debates have been positive over the last three years.

“We will continue to go to Brooksby Village as often as we can,” he said.

Boston Herald Sparring partners: Students debate seniors to warm up for BU event (by Tenley Woodman)

To prepare for tomorrow night’s war of words with George Stephanopoulos and Sen. Joseph Biden (D-Del.), two Manchester-Essex Regional High School students won old school.

Last month Chloe Viner, 17, and Chris Comenos, 16, debated Jerome E. Levy, 86, and Everett Carlton, 80, both residents of the Brooksby Village retirement community in Peabody, on whether the United States financial support to the United Nations should be increased.

The intergenerational match was arranged to decide whether Viner or Comenos would ask the first question at tomorrow’s United Nations Foundation debate at Boston University.

Stephanopoulos, Biden, WBZ-radio host David Brudnoy, Sen. Lincoln Chafee (R-R.I.) and Nabil Fahmy, Egyptian ambassador to the United States, will debate the topic “American Power and Global Security.”

The Brooksby debate proved to be the perfect litmus test for the two teens.

“It’s definitely more real to debate someone who knows the material,” Viner said following the Brooksby debate. “It’s harder, but I appreciate it more.”

Comenos said he called his grandparents prior to the match and asked how they would argue the topic so he could get an understanding of his opponents’ mindset.

The teams’ competitors, Levy and Carlton, are both World War II veterans.

Levy, a Harvard and MIT graduate, is a retired engineer and former physics teacher. Carlton is a retired banker.

“When I moved to Brooksby I wanted to stay involved,” Carlton said about participating.

Levy and Carlton argued the con side of the issue.

Though Comenos and Viner came equipped with statistics, age was a factor — after all, Levy and Carlton have lived through U.N. successes and failures since its inception in 1945.

Comenos argued that there are 57,000
The People Speak

standing troops being used by the United Nations and that the United States has more than 100,000 troops in Iraq, to which Levy quickly responded that the U.N. charter does not allow the United Nations to have a standing army.

"We have vetoed every resolution where it hasn't been even-handed," Levy said. "I don't want to talk numbers, I want to talk facts."

In the end, Viner and Casonos persevered, but the Brooksky men made an impact.

"It's very unlike the debates we have," said Ryan Swanson, 16, a MEHS junior at the debate. "But you get a lot more from it. They get feistier." Fellow classmate Erik Subbits, 16, agreed.

"I think it's pretty cool. You see a real difference of opinion between the elderly people and young people," said the junior.

Loretta Tenaglia, chairman of political outreach at Brooksky, said the debate offers a check and balance in political discussion.

"It gives exposure to the older populations who have lived through what they're debating. It allows us to see how the young people are doing," she said.

The topics discussed were the United States involvement with the global economy and peacekeeping. Discussions involved the war on terrorism, United States' use of military force abroad, the perceptions of the United States by others and what we can do about it, and the advantages/disadvantages of trade in a global economy. The format of the program was such that a speaker addressed a topic and then a 10 minute period for questions and discussion followed. The audience included Chardon city manager Dave Lelko and city councilperson Dave Campbell. The event received a lot of positive feedback.

The La Junta High School Forensic team hosted the area Toastmasters to promote a citizen dialogue about issues of global importance. The LJHS team selected the American Power and Global Security topic on which to center the discussion. Team members Kari Otteman, Nick Newby, Amber McVicker, Tim Kelley and Audrey Bradshaw shared their ideas along with Asst. Coach Mr. Warren Parker. The event allowed students and adults to present an opening statement and then flowed into a guided group discussion of the central topic. The event concluded with the audience being allowed to ask questions or add to the discussion. Audience members and panel members felt the event was worthwhile and the beginning step in forming a global vision for peace.

This event began with opening remarks from head coach Julia Brown-Millush about the school, the NFL, and the students’ interest in politics. A pre-debate poll was held to measure the opinion of the audience prior to the exchange of ideas. Each of the debaters began with a 5-8 minute constructive related to the ’04 Policy Debate peacekeeping topic followed by a 3 minute cross examination and a 3 minute rebuttal. After the debate, the floor was opened for lively audience debate. The event concluded with a post-debate poll to measure opinion changes. Three people had been swayed from their original position.

What were
The People Speak
Signature Events?

The United Nations Foundation, in partnership with ABC News and several progressive organizations produced twenty-four Signature The People Speak events. From New York City to Albuquerque, all twenty-four events were moderated by an ABC News Correspondent and included high profile policymakers, journalists, politicians, diplomats and academics. The National Forensic League played a unique role in these events. One area high school competitor was chosen in several signature cities to meet the moderator and panelists prior to the event, and was given the opportunity to ask the first question of the panel at the conclusion of the topic discussion. Read on to learn how NFL members challenged and impressed many American leaders.

Featured in this section are the nineteen events with NFL representation.

New York City

On September 13th, the Signature The People Speak events began in New York City with a discussion on American Power and Global Security. ABC’s George Stephanopoulos moderated a discussion between former Secretary of State Madeleine Albright, former Senior Advisor to the Presidential Envoy in Iraq Dan Senor, and Chilean Ambassador to the United Nations Heraldo Munoz. John Calhoun, an NFL member from Regis High School in New York City, prepared for the event in the green room with the panelists before attending the event and asking the first question from the audience.

Houston

September 20th brought The People Speak to Houston, Texas and a panel discussion on “Energy Choices and Environmental Challenges: How Far to the Last Drop?” Associate Director of the Rice University Energy Program and Wallace Wilson Fellow for Energy Studies at the James A. Baker III Institute for Public Policy of Rice University Amy Myers Jaffe, President and CEO of the United Nations Association of the USA the Honorable William H. Luers, Founder of the Global Energy Investors and Chairman of Energy and Communications Solutions, LLC the Honorable Robert C. “Bud” McFarlane, and the Editor of Oil & Gas Journal Bob Tippee sparked lively discussion on this timely topic. ABC correspondent Hari Sreenivasan moderated the event. Bellaire High School student and NFL member, Henry Tsai asked the first question of the panel.
Denver

On September 23rd, 2004, the University of Colorado at Boulder welcomed ABC Correspondent Cokie Roberts, former Senator and President of the United Nations Foundation and the Better World Fund Timothy E. Wirth, and former Senator Hank Brown in a discussion on "Hearts and Minds: Fortifying America’s Reputation in the World". Monarch High School student and NFL member, Brittany Crosby asked the first question of these esteemed policymakers.

Atlanta

On September 27th, 2004 a panel convened in Atlanta to discuss "Mending the Rift in Transatlantic Relations." Members of the panel included retired Brigadier General and current Vice President of International Business Development at Primencia Financial Services Zeb Bradford, foreign editor of the Frankfurter Allgemeine Zeitung Dr. Klaus-Dieter Frankenberger, Executive Director of Columbia University’s Council for European Studies Dr. John K. Glenn III, Deputy Director for NATO Policy in the Office of European Security and Political Affairs for the U.S. Department of State Jeffrey Hovenier, and Ambassador of the Slovak Republic to the U.S. His Excellency Rastislav Kacer. ABC News Correspondent Steve Osunsami moderated the event. NFL student Seth Gannon, from Woodward Academy, asked the panel a question regarding transatlantic relations.

Pittsburgh

September 23rd also brought The People Speak to Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania with a discussion centered upon American Power and Global Security. North Allegheny High School student and NFL member Dan Boada met with and asked the first question of a panel including the President of Refugees International Kenneth H. Sept. 20th

The program was presented at the American Legion Post. More than expected turned out, and audience members couldn’t wait to respond or comment in the panel discussion. Questions to the panel included: “How do perceptions of the U.S. affect our role in the World and what is causing these perceptions? To what extent should oil drive our foreign policies? What trade-offs should we be willing to make between environmental considerations and energy production? What responsibilities should America hold concerning foreign countries and foreign political turmoil?”

“They all expressed themselves very well. They do an excellent job.” Margie Swanson, American Legion Auxiliary.

Sept. 14th

Raymond Central High School held another The People Speak event, in a panel discussion format, with audience discussion following the students’ presentations.

“‘There was a lot of open discussion and debate between the panel and the audience on the topics. I think that the panel did an excellent job addressing the various topics and questions that arose.” Belle Howell, University of Nebraska student

“I think that the panel did an excellent job of sharing their thoughts and opinions, especially when responding to questions of the audience. It was very insightful.” Roseanne Scarto, parent

“This was an excellent opportunity to discuss issues. It was fun to debate issues with our young leaders.” David Smith, parent

Steven Tan and Eddie Wong participated in a debate about America exercising leadership in the world before community members. After the debate, the audience asked questions of the students about the debate.

“The debate between Connie Chung and Miles Prince was an excellent format—it was stimulating to see and hear [the] students. Looking forward to next year.” Pat Freeman, President of San Gabriel Education Foundation, member of the San Gabriel Rotary Club.

“The young people were most impressive.” Cheryl Prentice, member of San Gabriel Rotary Club.

Gabrielson HS, San Gabriel, CA, Sept. 1

Two members of the Gabrielson High School Speech and Debate Team put on a debate for the San Gabriel Rotary Club on Wednesday, September 1st. The debate between GHS seniors Miles Prince and Connie Chung centered around the United States’ dependency on foreign oil. Both students got to present their case, cross-examine their classmate, and make final comments. The floor was then opened to all of the members of the Rotary Club.

North Oldham HS, Goshen, KY, Sept. 16th

The North Oldham High School The People Speak was a panel discussion revolving around many issues pertinent to America’s role in the world today. The evening began with opening remarks from Superintendent of schools Dr. Blake Haselton. Following this, the North Oldham High School Debate Coach Merl McBee reviewed the format and introduced the panel of both students and community members. Each speaker had 3-4 minutes to speak on their topic. Between speakers, there was time allotted for discussion, comments, or questions from the audience and other panelists.

Derek McMahan, of the NOHS Debate Team, answered the question “Could the attacks on 9/11 have been prevented?” Floyd Jernigan, the State President of the Sons of the American Revolution explored the question, “What role should the United States seek in the world community?” He was followed by Nathan Fletcher of the NOHS Debate team and his analysis of “Is preemptive war an effective method for protecting the U.S.’s interests?”

Oldham County Judge-Executive Mary-Elle Kinser continued the discussion with her analysis of the gender issue, “What role should women play in the War on Terrorism and the War in Iraq, and should women serve in fighting combat units in war zones?” Next, NOHS Debater Kirk Laughlin presented his opinion on the topic, “Should the United States have pursued Saddam Hussein without the United Nations’ approval?” Expanding upon an interesting element in the U.S.'s involvement in Iraq, District Judge Jerry Crosby followed with a presentation on, “What role should African-Americans play in the War on Terrorism and the War in Iraq?” Next, U.S. Coast Guard Lt. Commander and Chairman of the Eagle Scout Board of Review Gerald A Nauert discussed, “Why Kentucky should be concerned about Homeland Security and what plans the Coast Guard has made to deal with this threat.” The final panelist, Harrison Holcomb of the NOHS Debate Team closed with analysis of the question, “Is engagement an effective means of improving human rights in developing countries?” Closing remarks were given by Dr. Terry Brooks, the North Campus Principal.

“Our The People Speak initiative in the North Oldham High School Cafeteria on Sept. 16th was enormously successful. We had over 120 people in attendance which was twice as many as we expected,” Merl J. McBee, NOHS Coach

The Courier-Journal-Debate engages Oldham students on foreign policy (By Toni Hoibrook)

To some, the question of whether the United States should have pursued the ouster of Saddam Hussein as Iraq’s leader is black and white. Kirk Laughlin argued in a debate yesterday that it’s not that simple.

The North Oldham High School junior urged students and members of the Prospect Rotary Club to consider the many complicating factors—from Iraqi oppression under Saddam’s regime to booted intelligence on presence of weapons of mass destruction to Saddam’s possible connections to terrorists who carried out Sept. 11, 2001, attacks in the United States.

But Kirk is keeping his answer to himself. He said his goal yesterday in the “People Speak” debate at the high school was to be a catalyst for deeper thought.

The debate was one of about 4,000 being held nationally this year in the People Speak Initiative, a grassroots effort sponsored by several organizations, including the National Forensic League and the United Nations Foundation, to engage Americans in discussions about foreign policy.

The Prospect Rotary Club co-sponsored yesterday’s debate because it fit into the organization’s goal to help youth become involved in their community and be well-informed, said Alan Laughlin, the club’s president and Kirk’s father.

Laughlin said the club also wanted the community to “see what these kids can do.”

Yesterday’s panel of debaters included four of the 10 members of the school’s debate team and community leaders, including Oldham County Judge-Executive Mary Ellen Kinser, District Judge

Jerry Crosby and Lt. Cmdr. Gerald A Nauert of the Coast Guard.

Addressing this year’s theme, “America’s future Role in the World: Peace, Security and Human Rights,” panelists posed some of the most pressing questions in American society today.

Could the Sept. 11 attacks have been prevented? Is pre-emptive war an effective method for protecting U.S. interest? What role do women and minorities play in the war against terrorism?

When one student asked panelist Floyd Jernigan, former president of the Kentucky Society of the Sons of the American Revolution, whether terrorism could be defeated, Jernigan remarked, “That’s one of the most thought-provoking questions I believe I’ve ever been asked.”

Students who participated earned points toward higher rankings in their standings as debaters, sophomore Derek McMahan said.

Harrison Holcomb, another sophomore, a member of the debate team, said the event also gave the team a chance to showcase itself to potential student recruits in the audience.

Junior Eric McNeil said he’s not sure he wants to join the team, but he’s glad he attended the debate with his advanced-placement American history class. “It’s good for students to be aware of these issues,” Eric said, adding that the sometimes-heated discussion illustrates that “everybody has a voice.”

“We are all leaving here with lots on our minds,” said school board vice chairwoman Joyce Fletcher, whose son Nathan was on the panel of student debaters.

Fletcher said the debate would stimulate further thought on such topics, and she told students, “Don’t ever hesitate to ask questions.”

Exchange Club Meeting
Sept. 28th

This event was held at the regular weekly Wauseon Exchange Club meeting. Three of the extemporaneous speakers make a timed presentation. They did additional research in preparation to field any questions that they might have been asked by the members of the Exchange Club. After each timed presentation, members of the Exchange Club were given a designated period of time to respond concerning the issue at hand. These responses were in the form of questions which the students' presentations peaked in the audiences' thoughts.

The moderator for the day was the current Americanism chairperson for the Exchange Club, Mrs. Sandra Barber. In addition to being a member of the Exchange Club, she is an elected official in the county, and was a delegate to the 2004 Republican Convention in New York.

Brian Peck spoke on the question "How should America exercise leadership in the world?" He was followed by Lily Bumb who spoke on "Should we be concerned about poverty in Africa and other parts of the developing world? If so, why?"

Finally, Jennifer VanPelt spoke on "What are the costs and benefits of agricultural subsidies?"

Also present at the meeting was the Editor in Chief and the City Editor of the local newspaper, The Fulton County Expositor.

At the conclusion of the event, panelists and audience members exchanged questions, answers, and comments.

Wauseon Speech Team Ventures into Worldly Topics,
Fulton County Expositor (By Steve Colon)

Several members of the Wauseon High School Speech Team joined with the Wauseon Exchange Club on Tuesday to discuss America's role in the world.

The National Forensic League and the United Nations Foundation "People Speak" program is designed "to encourage important debate and discussion among community members to create stronger relationships with local civic organizations and members of the community while discussing key issues facing our world."

Speech team members juniors Olivia Bumb and Jennifer VanPelt and senior Brian Peck each presented three minute speeches on varying topics and then opened the floor for discussion.

"This is a great way to get experience for our extempers and debaters," said team coach Dolores Muller. "These discussions have been done in the month of September nationwide."

Some of the topics included: How should America exercise leadership in the world? Should we concerned about poverty in Africa and the developing world?; and What are the benefits and costs of agricultural subsidies?

In addition to preparing speeches, the students were required to conduct vast amounts of research in order to be prepared for any question that might come their way.

VanPelt felt she was prepared for all of her questions after about three weeks of practice. "We debated each of our topics after each practice," she said.

Bumb felt her many hours of research paid off.

"You can answer questions more efficiently if you have facts," she said. "You can't debate facts."

All the students felt this was a worthwhile venture for both them and the people who heard the speeches.

"I think with the election coming up, it was good to discuss the issues wise we will be a close, tight (presidential) race." Peck said.

The programs' design to spur discussion is important as Bumb understands.

"Everyone can watch the news, but not everybody gets a chance to talk about the issues," she said. "We discuss them in order to get a better understanding."

This was the only time the team made plans to present the program this year. Muller said she would like to see her group do more presentations to other civic and government groups in subsequent years.

It was a great way to give these students a voice in the community, thereby building their confidence in using the speaking skills they are learning as participants in the National Forensic League. From a coach's perspective I would have to say that all in all this was a very worthwhile project." Dolores Muller, Coach, Wauseon High School

Members of the Lions, Kiwanis, Rotary, Jaycees, and Lioness Clubs were all invited to attend The People Speak event. The forensics squad asked several school organizations to send a representative to participate in a “public forum” to discuss leadership in a global world. Members of the Southwest HS Key Club, Student Council, Honor Society, Young Democrats, Young Republicans, AP World History Class, Advanced Debate Class, Forensic Team, and FBLA were represented. The team also invited a panel of adults to participate, including Associate Superintendent of Lincoln Public Schools Dr. Marilyn Moore, Lincoln Public School Board Member Lillie Larsen, State Senator Ron Raikes, Lincoln Southwest Principal Jerry Wilks, and Lincoln Public Schools Multicultural/Community Administrator Thomas Christie.

Each student first gave a two-minute speech discussing a specific area of U.S. involvement in the global arena. Topics included globalization, outsourcing, democracy, environmental concerns, energy concerns, economic prosperity and global security. The student panel was then given a minute to cross-examine the speaker. The second portion of the evening featured the adult panel giving commentary on the arguments they heard from the students. Third, the audience was given the opportunity to ask questions and discuss issues with all members of the panels.

The Lindale HS Debate Program put a distinct and interesting spin on their The People Speak project. Public discussion and debate on foreign and domestic policy issues were presented in the form of a mock presidential debate and election. Parliamentary debate was incorporated in order to stimulate interest and also inform the public. Two students were chosen to represent President Bush’s policies and two students were chosen to represent Sena-
It also helped having an audience. "When we debate for a tournament, they’re not really public," McKenzie said. "This was public. People got to see what we do in debate tournaments."

They hit on the typical issues about the economy, taxes, terrorism, and the Iraq conflict. There were a few shots at the other party, but it seemed more like comical relief than personal stabs.

All the participants drew applause. The happiest of all may have been the teacher.

This was a new experiment. Caldwell’s students have held mock presidential debates in the past, but they were done during school hours.

This was the first time to go public and it turned out to be a wise choice.

In addition to the debate, Holley Nees spoke about the importance of voting and the electoral college. Brittany Allen spoke about the importance of public debate.

Those in attendance also had opportunities to register to vote.

"We had so much fun doing this," Caldwell said. "We sat down together and I assigned the parties. I wanted them to represent a certain side whether they agreed with it or not. They did put everything together and did great."

NFL Debaters Evaluate Presidential Debate

Who Will Be Our Next President?

By Ben Casselman

Reprint from The Salem News
Friday, October 1, 2004

MANCHESTER -- George Bush and John Kerry both have reputations as strong debaters, but the two candidates should be glad they were facing each other instead of the teenagers gathered in Paige Journey's living room.

While Bush and Kerry were sparring on Iraq, terrorism, and nuclear proliferation at the University of Miami last night, eight members of the Manchester Essex Regional high School debate team were crowded around a wide-screen television picking apart every argument, jumping at every gaffe, and pointing out every missed argument in the year's first presidential debate.

"You're not answering the question," Chris Comenos snapped at the president early in the debate.

"He has a bad habit of starting off with 'uh,'" Wendell Smith said of Bush.

"This is a dodge right here," team president Jeff Gang said as Bush began to discuss the International Criminal Court.

"No, it's actually an instructive point," his brother Chris countered.

And so it went for the full hour and a half of the debate. The students scribbled notes as they watched, and traded quips and barbs at the candidates and at each other, giving credit to good points and taking off points on imaginary score sheets for unanswered arguments.

This was hardly the candidates' target audience, of course. All but two of the students, along with their coach, were Bush opponents—that didn't necessarily make them all Kerry supporters—and only one student, Journey, said she planned to vote for the president.

But the debaters were equal-opportunity critics, willing to point out errors by either candidate. And despite their political differences, they agreed more often than they disagreed. Bush, they said, seemed more flustered than Kerry, and took longer to collect his thoughts. Someone watching the debate on mute, they said, would have fallen squarely into Kerry's camp.

But even with the sound on, Bush didn't win many style points in the room.

"He's just not a very good speaker," Smith said of the president.

The debaters also noted significant differences in the two candidates' strategies. Bush, they said, was trying to keep to a few basic points: ife is firm, Kerry is not; the Iraq war made America safer; and he will protect the country.

"Bush just kept to the same three points," Jake Elder said.

Kerry, meanwhile, was trying to soften his image and seem less condescending than he has in the past.

"He's talking down-home," the team's coach, Tim Averill, noted during the debate. "Somebody told him to drop the accent, talk down-home and he's doing really well with that."

So who won? That depends on who's judging.

Kerry was a debater in high school and college, and both candidates took a course on public speaking at Yale -- where, coincidentally, several Manchester's debaters headed for a three-day tournament. The debaters agreed that Kerry's experience showed -- had this been a high school debate, they agreed, Kerry would have won.

But it wasn't a high school debate, and the group was less certain who would win in the court of public opinion.

"Definitely John Kerry won," team vice president Sarah Shea said. "Although I think the Public of America would probably internalize more Bush's, 'We're staying on the offensive' message."

But the one undecided voter in the audience, Comenos, said he was swayed more by Kerry than by Bush.

"Kerry won the debate," Comenos said. "His final speech was far stronger. Kerry showed his varied strengths and Bush was monolithic."

Everyone agreed, however, that both sides avoided disaster, which in the end may have been their greatest goal.

"I think it's going to be a draw," Averill said. "Neither one fouled up this debate at all."

Believable Analysis and Source Selection in Extemp

By Scott Cheesewright

The world of extemporaneous speaking began in 1931, in a very different National Forensic League, and as a very different event. With the advent of extemporaneous speaking, it was undoubtedly the speaking part which was emphasized. Speakers who spoke well were the ones who won - not the ones who could analyze a topic. Tournament final rounds, including the final round of the NFL national tournament, were populated with speakers who were incredibly eloquent, but who would often cite three or less sources, would never state their topic question, never answer the question, never support an answer they gave, used introductions lasting well beyond two minutes of their speeches, and included obvious factual errors

The art of extemp has always required talent in speaking, persuasiveness, presentation, and personality. Since the early 1980's, the role of source quality has changed and expanded significantly in nationally successful extemp speaking. This paper considers that change, and then the function and impact of source selection and analysis. The article further evaluates possible alternatives in selecting sources, and offers suggestions on how to improve the quality, clarity and depth of analysis. Through this, the article serves as one possible guide for both beginning and experienced extemp speakers.

To understand how to find good sources, and develop quality analysis, an extemper must know what s/he is looking for. Analysis and source selection may seem like a simple issue, but it is important to know the criteria to best use in order to critique sources.

Initially, source selection is often the more complex issue, on what an extemper might want, and when. The foremost concern is addressing the bias of a new source. A common problem with the selection of sources is a fear of bias. The Nation Magazine, for example, has historically been considered a socialist magazine, and so many extempers will shy away from using it. In some regions, however, the bias of a magazine such as The Nation will be understood, but the quality of analysis is also recognized. For a similarly thoughtful conservative view extempers might use the National Review. The bias of a magazine can actually become very useful in an extemp speech, for it could aid in the strength and depth of analysis - when used appropriately. An extemper who uses a biased source may make note of the bias, and use this not only to reflect a point, but to also relay to the judge a point about media censorship, the beliefs of a group of people, or about government control of media resources.

An extemper must also not forget think-tanks, which will reflect a well researched, analytical, but legitimate biased report. A primary example is such is the Cato Institute. This libertarian think-tank is highly regarded in extemp, especially due to great quantity and variety of analytical tools. By correctly using a biased source, the content of a speech may be significantly improved.

There exists, unfortunately, a risk to using a biased source, even a lightly biased source. A primary example of this is seen in West Texas. Extempers in this region have been given poor marks in a round for using 'the diet cola of media bias,' the New York Times. While considered by some to be one of the best newspapers published in the U.S., the New York Times often reflects a left bias to the left. While extempers may make use of biased sources, they must keep in mind to use such a tactic in moderation, and to know their region -- for the expectations for 'good extemp' change in every region of the nation.

Another strategy of extempers, usually more prevalent in college extemp but emerging in high school, is the extensive use of foreign sources. A report from The Japan Times will often sound more prestigious in an extemp speech than another citing of The Economist. A second purpose of foreign sources is to demonstrate to the hard work put in by the extemper. Just as recently dated articles will show audiences that an extemper has been working hard, so too will using more obscure foreign sources. A third reason to use foreign sources near the topic area subject is credibility. When an extemper uses a source from the nation they are talking about, there is an air of primary sourcebelievability. But the source must be geographically relevant. If an obscure Russian newspaper is cited in an article about the Brazilian economy, the extra credibility can be lost. The foreign source quickly becomes just another obscure paper - not added to, but actually damaging the credibility of the source, and the speaker.

Foreign and biased sources have an important role to play in extemp, but the final type of source is merely the unbiased, credible, western source. Using these sources is the safe road. There are also more western sources that must be considered. Journals, quarterlies, and studies will contain less bias and add to the content of a speech, due to their often renowned prestige. (And they usually have cool sounding names!)

Regardless of the type of source - foreign, domestic, biased, not biased - the role of sources should, and does always remain the same. A good source, when used properly, will establish better ethos for a speaker, the judge will believe the speaker to be more credible. This is vital in an event that is based on persuasion. Beyond establishing the ethos of a speaker, the selection of sources used by an extemper will demonstrate the work, which goes into the event outside of your thirty minute prep-time. Extimp is won and lost outside of tournaments.

In a statistical study of the national tournament's final round, N. Andre Cossette found that extempers who used more sources and more quality, varied sources were the extempers who performed the best. Of the finalists, the average sources per speech were 5.83, however non-finalists averaged only 3.36 sources. The study also found that finalists cited common sources 14.2% of the time, while non-finalists cited such sources 46.8% of the time. The number and quality of sources has a direct correlation to the results that will come back on an extemper's ballot.

There is more to extemp than sources, especially in the realm of analysis. An extemper must keep in mind that the eventual goal of an extemp speech is to have clear and deep analysis, which convinces the judge. The goal of analytical content is very similar to the goal for source quality and quantity. Analysis demonstrates, as sources do, a wealth of knowledge, and hard work outside of the round. Good analysis aids the extemporaneous speaker several ways.

The first of the two is in depth of analysis. Very simply, superficial analysis will not be convincing to a judge, and will not convince them as well as would in depth analysis. Exemp is an event that requires practice, especially to establish a fluent, smooth, and entertaining speaking style. To develop that, most successful extempers will have practiced hundreds of speeches during one speech season. The problem is that often, the extemper will develop too much of a "cookie cutter" style of analysis. To solve a problem, all questions are answered with social, economic, and political changes. While such an approach may have advantages, often it will overshadow true depth of analysis. Could all of the United States' economic woes be solved with one change? The clear answer is no. Neither will the economic problems of Zimbabwe and very often (especially in international extemp) an extemper will act as if they would answer 'yes'. The depth of analysis is truly important to providing real solutions, to the all too real problems proposed in extemp rounds - and avoid the 'extemper's magic wand'.

The next goal of analysis is much like the first, to have specific solutions to the problems in an extemp speech. Just as all problems don't necessarily break into superficial categorization, there are also problems which have their own difficulties. One economic principle doesn't govern all the policies of the world, and so an extemper must learn from this, and ensure that they are looking into the specific problems of a nation in their analysis.

If these two analytical techniques are followed, then the analysis of an extemper will be greatly strengthened. Coupled with good source citation, an extemper may be on their way to success, and national recognition. The new world of extemp, one which is based on sources and the analysis supported by those sources, is one which most extempers must adapt to. In achieving these goals, the extemper will appear, and be, more practiced - and likely gain the trophies, experience, and knowledge to prove it.

Following is a sampling of some of the best sources currently available. It is not meant to be a complete list, but these entries are a good place to start:

NFL Poses Two Debatable Questions for Students to Challenge

Visit the newly created "Student Resources" section of the NFL website and join the "student challenge!"

A lucky group has come to notice that there is a section of the NFL website devoted to the students within the league. One area under Student Resources is the Student Challenge. Each month, this challenge will pose a question(s) to NFL students and the most interesting of the answers will appear in the Rostrum. This month, the NFL asked students to tell us "Which cartoon character (television or print) would make the best debater and why? Which would make the worst?" Second question posed was: "What is the funniest comment you have ever received on a debate or speech ballot?" Here are responses received:

Question 1
Cartoon Characters

Blondie/Fred/Stewie
I would have to say that Dagwood from the Blondie cartoons would tie with Fred Flintstone for the worst debaters. Neither have very much common sense or can easily put things together under pressure. I do however think that Stewie from Family Guy would make the best cartoon debater for the obvious reasons of articulation and intelligence!

Jessica
Texas

Bugs/Porky Pig
Bugs Bunny would be the best debater. It seems like that rabbit can talk his way out of anything. Porky Pig would make the worst because of his stutter. That would not be very practical when spreading.

Ian
Texas

Martin/Calvin
I believe that the best character would be Martin from the "Simpsons", because he always comes up with a solution that solves problems and saves his own life in the process. I think that Calvin, from "Calvin and Hobbes", would be the worse debater because of the fact that he is willing to use wrong facts if only to make an absurd point.

Ali
California

Bugs/Daffy Duck
The cartoon character that would make the best debater would have to be Bugs Bunny because he can think on his feet, is a good arguer, and makes a lot of good points. Plus, he is delightfully witty. The cartoon character that would make the worst debater would have to be Daffy Duck because he loses his temper too fast and he cannot argue that well and the fact that he is always losing the debates he has with Bugs Bunny.

Denise
Wyoming

Tom/Jerry
In my opinion, Jerry would make the best debater, and Tom would make the worst. Jerry continually catches and traps Tom with every attempt Tom makes to catch Jerry and eat him.

Margarita
Florida

Question 2
Funniest Comment on Ballot

I once received the following on my policy debate ballot. "You should do HI!"

Roy
Texas

"Nice shirt and tie combo; comb your hair; your belt does not match your shoes."

Jeffrey
California

It was at a semi round in DX. I knew nothing about my topic, and evidently it was apparent to the judge. One word was on the ballot. "Ouch."

Adam
Texas

"I loved your take on the topic. It was the most refreshing thing I have ever seen. It was the best speech I have seen in a long time. But I am giving you last place.

Scott
Indiana

"Evidence isn't important."

Mariana
Washington

"Don't use such big words--like affirmative and negative."

Jacob
New Mexico

Meet Tara Tate

By Sarah Gildea
NFL Staff

What was your first NFL experience?

Well, I have been familiar with the NFL since I was a small child because my mom was a speech and debate coach. I actually kept time at tournaments as a child. But, as a freshman competitor, I was entered in the district tournament in DI.

When did you decide to be a teacher and/or coach?

It was kind of a combination of my love for the activity and the death of my father, who was an educator, that led me to reevaluate my career path. I couldn’t bear myself away from forensics. Seeing the outpouring of students around my father’s death really changed the way that I wanted to contribute to society, and I thought education was the best way to do that.

What is your team philosophy?

Our team philosophy is “never be satisfied.” Both as competitors and individuals, we should always be striving to be better people.

How many hours do you spend with this activity a week?

Typically I travel 5 out of every 6 weekends, but not counting travel time, teaching or tournaments...I probably spend 4-5 hours a day watching practice rounds or researching, which I guess translates into about 20 hours a week of non-teaching, non-traveling debate coaching time.

What is your vision for the future of the NFL?

I’ve been very excited about the new direction that Scott Wann is taking us. I think it’s important to continue making ties to the community that relate our students to the public, such as the United Nations Foundation debates this year. I also think providing organizational support for educators is an important facet. For example, the new website jumpstarts curriculum exchanges to keep educators motivated in the activity.

What is exciting about being an NFL coach in the state of Illinois?

First of all, the collegiality amongst the NFL coaches in Illinois is wonderful. Coaches are so supportive of one another. Our students travel out of state together. The National Forensic League provides a mechanism for coaches to come together. They’re wonderful.

What’s unique about Glenbrook South as an NFL chapter?

One thing that’s unique about our program is that our students have the ability to participate at a high level of competition in combination with being a good team member and having good academic performance.

What qualities do you look for when recruiting students for your program?

The students have to show quick critical thinking skills and be able to “play well with others.” You can teach someone debate and how to debate successfully, but it’s hard to teach how to be a good team member. I look for a balance between both of those.

How has the NFL changed since your days as a competitor?

It has definitely gotten larger and more opportunities for students are available. It is hard for me to make a true comparison because I was at a small program when I competed and now I coach a much larger program. It’s like looking at the NFL through a completely different light. A lot of the themes stay constant, but it’s bigger and there’s a lot more community outreach. We’re incorporating more students with more opportunities to compete.

What is your favorite memory from a National Tournament?

It’s both a good and painful memory. In 2002, a program I coached for was in the final round of policy and we lost on a 5-4 decision. The process of dealing with a one ballot loss was interesting. I have a lot of good memories of Nationals, of coming together with people from all over the country.

What is the greatest challenge as a coach today?

Balance. Balancing the time of a personal life and the demands of a job. The teaching, the practice, the travel, hosting your own tournament...and trying to keep all of these aspects a success.

Are there any rituals/lucky traditions that you employ as a coach?

We’re always starting new traditions. It’s important to keep a history of the program so that debaters in the future can look back...yearly scrapbooks, perpetual plaques in the debate office of past presidents of the program and past successes. There’s a lot of reliance on senior leadership...and that ends up becoming a ritual when seniors start realizing that being part of this program is helping younger students. Running a tournament the size of The Glenbrooks is a ritual in itself.

What’s your favorite weekend tournament food item?

I would have to say it’s at the Montgomery Bell Academy tournament, the goo goo clusters.
Promoting Citizenship Through Middle School Debate

By Carol Rogaski

Although promoting citizenship is one of the major goals of education, there is not always a clear direction as to how this goal can be achieved. Schools use an arsenal of prepared programs and community service projects to promote citizenship. This large variety of programs shares at least one common element: an emphasis on active involvement. Among the various ways that New Jersey’s Cranbury School has promoted active citizenship is the development of a quarterly seventh grade course in debate.

One of the challenges faced in creating a debate course for middle school was the relative lack of “how to” resources for this age group. Although debate sometimes appears as a social studies activity, it is often in the context of arguing sides of a historical event where the students already know the outcome. Students may gain a greater understanding of historical perspectives from these activities but they are not truly challenged to reason out issues on their own. Resources specifically addressing debate techniques generally target high school students involved in formal forensics competitions. So, how can you adapt a debate format to the middle school level? And how can debate be used to promote decision-making and citizenship for young adolescents?

Benefits of Middle School Debate

When choosing a format, an adapted congressional style debate best addressed the needs of our class because of its tie-ins with our civics program. Our debate procedure starts with opening the meeting, introducing a proposal, then having first pro, first con, second pro, and second con speeches followed by a general floor debate and voting. Statements to a speaker are generally expressed in the form of a question; the guiding rule is that an idea can be questioned, but the speaker can never be personally “attacked.” Using these elements of parliamentary procedure promotes an atmosphere of mutual respect among students while exchanging ideas. Questioning speakers in an orderly manner encourages high levels of participation among even the more hesitant students. Interestingly, students who communicated better verbally than in writing found they could have high levels of success in an arena that did not require them to struggle with the mechanics of a formal research paper.

Introductory Activities

The course’s activities are divided into three stages, introductory activities, research, and debate. During this progression, students increasingly take ownership of the decision-making and debate processes. Introductory activities include defining the purpose of debate and teaching basic procedures. For example, an ice breaking “nonsense debate” is a low-pressure method of teaching the order of speaking. In this activity, students argue pro and con for an improbable law, such as setting a speed limit on lawnmowers. Students eagerly volunteer to use their most persuasive, “nonsense” arguments while learning the order of speaking. Once the students have a thorough understanding of basic procedure, they move on to brainstorming and choosing topics of their own.

Before having students select issues, you may need to discuss any limitations or guidelines on subject matter that relate to school policy. Limitations might include topics that could lead students to violate the school’s anti-bullying policies or topics that are generally discussed only with parental permission. Students also need to be reminded that a debate explores possible solutions to public issues and is not a forum for personal grievances. However, tackling controversial topics, such as underage alcohol use, can reinforce responsible, critical thinking once students begin searching for evidence.

When selecting a debate topic, middle school students may want to debate issues specific to their school or community. These concerns can be generalized to state or national issues in order to be more easily researched. For example, the desire for more cafeteria snacks could relate to the issue of the healthiness of federal school lunch nutritional guidelines. Proposing a local skateboard park could be developed into an examination of physical fitness programs or product safety.

Once an issue has been chosen, students will need to be assigned to pro or con sides. My personal experience has indicated strong advantages to random selection of pro and con speakers for an issue versus allowing the students to self-select sides. Students quickly eliminate

"one sided" issues from a brainstormed list if there is a chance of being assigned to a position that has little supporting evidence. Random selection also insures a balanced number of speakers for each side. Students who draw sides contrary to their own opinion can learn to examine opposing perspectives of an issue. Finally, random assignment "protects" students who are arguing an unpopular position because their job is to examine the issue rather than to defend their own personal opinions.

Research

Once students understand basic debate procedures and acquire their assigned positions, the focus shifts to researching supporting evidence. Before looking for sources, I have found that having cooperative groups critique a variety of articles to for credibility and relevance to an issue enables them to work more efficiently when finding evidence. Although they can use a variety of print and media sources, debate is especially conducive to the use of the Internet as a research tool. Many newspapers and magazines have on-line archives, which can be searched for up to date articles, and students have access to professional journals or government resources as well. Young researchers can use news-specific search engines such as www.headlinespot.com to find evidence from news services all over the world. Our students generally find search engines such as www.google.com, www.ask.com, or www.dogpile.com to be user-friendly, while www.google.com/unclesam has the added benefit of eliminating most non-relevant sites from the search list.

Once the students find evidence related to their issue, they are guided in note taking and organizing information for their speeches. Regardless of the method chosen in preparing their speeches, it is important that the students get the material into their own words, and that they can locate their information source if their evidence is challenged by another debater. Students who have stumbled over technical terms or could not back up their evidence during questioning quickly appreciated the benefits of these organizational steps.

The Debates

A procedure for debating that is especially useful for our class was to begin with an initial class wide debate on one topic before breaking into smaller groups. Starting with a one topic debate allows for more focused lessons when first learning research, organization, and debate techniques. Later, four-person debate teams can provide the students with opportunities to select issues individualized to their own interests, while the teacher acts more as a research coach or facilitator. Students arguing the same position are encouraged to partner up to share resources, "test out" arguments, and develop speeches that complement and reinforce each other's debates.

When the students were first learning parliamentary procedure, the teacher's natural "authority" role was used to model the chairperson's role. As students grow in their ability to debate, a number of them will want to extend their leadership skills by taking over as chairperson. Drawing lots was accepted as a fair method of chair selection if time constraints prevent all volunteers from getting a turn.

Evaluation

When evaluating student performance, a priority was to assess the overall performance of the students beyond their speeches. Since the course emphasis was on debate as a method of examining ideas, the debates were not graded as a competitive event. In addition to the logic and delivery of the speech itself, participation and parliamentary procedure were weighted heavily. Taking a transcript allows for revisiting and verifying key points in the students' arguments, and providing more personalized feedback for future speeches. Additionally, the students' research folders and notes are reviewed to determine the depth of their backup work, and to provide suggestions for future research.

Once the first debate is completed, our students also become involved in the assessment process by self-critiquing the strengths and weaknesses of their performances. After each debate, the class members specify areas that they individually would like to reinforce or improve. Progress toward these personal goals is included in the student's assessment rubric for the following debate.

Conclusion

Used effectively, debate provides middle school students with tools for discussing, prioritizing, researching, and critically examining issues. It encourages young adolescents to speak out in a well-informed manner. Classes in debate can be structured to give further opportunities for making choices and taking ownership for student learning. Hopefully, these skills will empower students to make active, responsible decisions.... The types of decisions that are essential to true citizenship.

Debate is a Mind Field Winter Policy Briefs

We offer 2500 pieces of evidence, at least 700 of which are post election updates on politics, budget, economy, international security and UN intervention!

Why a new resource now?

- The most successful team debate schools hire research staff, or have huge student populations to mine for updated research. Most schools can’t respond in kind and even the most motivated debaters find their academic and personal lives squeezed by updating demands.
- Updated evidence does matter. The economy, elections, and international security dynamics are all very fluid—especially in a presidential election year.

Debate is a Mind Field Winter Briefs features:

- 2500 cards—700 of these are published post Nov.7th 2004
- 90% of evidence is published post March 2004

This past Presidential election was the most contentious in my lifetime. Not only did it seem like Democrats and Republicans agreed on very little, it also seemed like there was actual animosity - maybe even hatred - directed to the standard bearers of the other party. Discussions about politics seemed to get heated in the most casual of settings. Articles were written in the popular press about the phenomenon, citing rifts developing within families and among coworkers. Perhaps what was lacking in the usual back-and-forth of political talk were the tools to parse arguments and to decide which position was the stronger or the weaker - perhaps what was lacking was a common knowledge of debate.

But then September rolled around, and something happened; the debates happened. While there was very little that Democrats and Republicans agreed on, one thing was clear to everybody: the debates between the two candidates turned out to be extremely important. Coming into the first debate behind in the polls, Kerry exited from the trio of contests in a dead heat with the incumbent. Several factors were responsible for the change in the polls, but perhaps the most important was simply that the majority of people who listened to the debates thought Kerry had won "on substance."

Substance is something which was sorely lacking in our political discourse - but in the debates it was inescapable. Both candidates not only presented their narrative of the country's issues (how we got to where we are, and what we should do next), but they also actually attempted to provide clash with each other's arguments. This direct back-and-forth was missing from all other forums (campaign speeches, advertisements, documentaries, etc), and it served to remind everyone just how important debate is.

Debate is the only forum where you are actually judged on your ability to answer and win arguments - and thus it provides the most useful mechanism to decide between competing political visions, since it uniquely creates an incentive to answer arguments.

What are the alternatives to debate? Are there any? Absent a forum where arguments are resolved, what is the mechanism to diffuse disagreements? A little reflection on those questions forces one to realize that without organized discussions to resolve disagreements, and without a stated goal to come up with solutions to questions as provided in debate, people might be more apt to settle differences in political values violently. That's not an overstatement - that's history.

Given how much flux there is in organized scholastic debate - "flux" meaning new activities like "public forum debate", and "flux" meaning criticisms of the very act of debating seeping into policy debate rounds, complete with rather radical alternatives to the traditional back-and-forth of policy debate - perhaps now would be a good time for debaters to take a step back and review the impact of debate on this latest era of political change in our country, and realize how important our activity is. Perhaps a review of how dramatically debate affected the election would help debaters to redebate themselves to the more classic aspects of the activity - since it is now clearer than ever that good policy debate-oriented clash can actually change minds and effect political movements. Perhaps the current group of debaters should be educated as to who the coaches were in this year's rounds of Presidential debates: on the Republican side there was Karl Rove, a former high school debater, and on the Democratic side there was Robert Shrum, a former college NDT-level debater for Georgetown, and a coach at Boston College. Knowing who the players are may help debaters understand that they are training themselves for a future on a greater stage... and hearing even presidential candidates arguing for change in the light of obstacles - for fiat - may help reinvigorate even the oldest conventions of our activity.

One thing came through loud and clear these past few months: debate is important. Debate is worth doing and it is worth teaching. The accomplished debater can sway those hostile to her position, and can win converts to his agenda. In a world where information comes at the individual in an unrelenting deluge, debate can provide the means not only to filter information, but to reshape it as the debater deems appropriate. Congratulations to those of you who have dedicated yourself to this activity. Take a moment to appreciate what debate is, and help keep it strong.

Meet the Staff

Sherry Skurr
NFL

Interview by Carol Zanto

Sherry Skurr joined the NFL family in March of 2002 as a part-time calligrapher.

All new members of NFL receive a vellum certificate with their name and date of membership printed in calligraphy. With growth in membership and the implementation of the online points system, the NFL needed another person to print calligraphy at the peak times during February and March when coaches enroll a great number of new members. The NFL knew that finding another talented calligrapher with the quality we were accustomed to, would be a difficult task. Much to our delight, staff member Joyce Krueger recommended her cousin Sherry who has proven to be outstanding. Sherry also helps print calligraphy on the National Tournament student certificates.

Sherry is a very busy person. Since 1985 she has been employed with TRIACH Incorporated making biology slides for colleges and universities all over the world. On weekends she works as a receptionist for European Day Spa.

Sherry is a native of Ripon, WI. Her husband Russell drives a semi for Smith Transport. They have a son, Aaron, who works for Northwest Mutual and a daughter, Andrea who works for US Bank. Daughter Andrea also teaches pilates and is currently studying massage therapy.

"I enjoy working with my hands and view it as a form of art."
